

VOGUE

VERSATILE

London's Treasure

London Jewellery Week just wrapped up. Here are the designers to keep an eye on!

Giorà

- Cover Story >
- Fashion >
- Stars >
- Curiosity >
- Inspired by >
- How to wear >
- Shop the trend >
- Where to buy >
- Designers and Ateliers >
- Collections >

+ I Vogue It (3) < Share

fullscreen

It's not an event that focuses on bling, carat size or ultra-precious stones, but that's not the aim. London Jewellery Week just wrapped up, and it's a show that is growing and playing up the scouting aspect, looking for niche designers who focus on creativity, innovation and craftsmanship.

The highlight of the week was definitely the new edition of Treasure, which was held for the first time in Victoria House in Bloomsbury. We took a look around and browsed the creations of up-and-coming designers, scoped out new trends and admired pieces made with avant-garde materials.

The winners of the much coveted Jewellery Designer of the Year award - Yunus and Eliza - really stand out for their jewels inspired by classic mythology. One has a background in figurative sculpture while the other studied restoration. One young designer of fashion jewels to keep an eye on is Zelia Horsley. She combines acrylic and metallic chain coils with mechanical elements, bringing an attitude and a bit of glamour to her bracelets and necklaces that are hard to ignore.

Then there were the oversized silver cuffs by Ute Decker, Jessica De Lotz's 'retro bling' Oria's bucolic engravings, the golden geometries of Cindy Dennis Mangan and Sarah Herriot and the unconventional sculptures by Mahtab Hanna (she refers to it as 'dichotomy jewellery').

Federica Frosini

Related content

Designers and Ateliers Shocking jewels!

Challenging the stylistic conventions and clichés, the designer Solange Azagury-Partridge discovers new decorative language. Photo gallery

Mahtab Hama

